Growing opportunities to expand the mind

Misericordia University OT research project studies effectiveness of a transitional vocational training program for special needs students at Lands at Hillside Farms

JACKSON TWP., Pa. – The crisp fall morning does little to deter Brandon Dewey, 17, of Dallas from preparing a portion of the Dream Green Farm Program’s farmland at the Lands at Hillside Farms for planting its most popular crop – garlic. Dressed in a short-sleeved pocket T-shirt, the Luzerne Intermediate Unit 18 (LIU) student carefully follows a string-lined path to punch small holes in the earth with a long garden tool handle. Fellow LIU student Josh Lockavich of Luzerne follows closely behind, planting the varietal bulbs in the holes, some eight-inches apart, and covering them with loose soil.

It is planting season – at least for the Music, Inchelium red, German red and Polish Softneck garlic crops – and the 10 LIU students who plant, harvest and sell the produce in support of the Dream Green Farm Program, a transitional vocational training internship that develops work skills for students with learning needs. Housed on the 412-acre Lands at Hillside Farms, the collaborative program features about two dedicated acres of farmland, a general education building, storage shed, and an assortment of equipment.

“It’s a learning experience,” Dewey acknowledges, while taking a short break. “It’s pretty fun, also. Our boss teaches us a vocabulary word of the day. We have to learn things like planting and tilling.

There are so many other things to do here. We learn people skills when we are down there (at the Wilkes-Barre Farmers Market). Math is a good idea, because you have to count the cash and give people their change.”

The Dream Green Farm Program was born in 2009 with the assistance of a $99,000 United States Department of Agriculture grant. The program between Lands at Hillside Farms and LIU has grown from a start-up to a self-sustaining operation that also provides assistance to operations at the nonprofit landmark in the Back Mountain.

On this day, the students prep and plant the last section of the garden for garlic. A blanket of hay already covers the bulbs that were planted earlier in the week. Before the full onset of winter, the students and the Dream Green Program manager and job coaches will till over the rest of the garden and plant winter rye as a cover crop to protect nutrients in the field. Many of the crops they will plant in spring will be grown from seed during the winter in the greenhouses on the historic farm. Those seedlings become tomatoes, peppers, squash, cucumbers, strawberries, leaf lettuce, pumpkins, flowers, and more in early summer.

“The students that attend Hillside love talking about the program,” says Allison Hausman ’17, O.T.S., Lancaster, Pa., a Misericordia occupational therapy student who is studying the transitional vocational training program. “They’re all very excited to be there and they actually do have an interest in farming and what they are doing there.”

In between the planting and harvesting of their crops, the students and mentors treat the experience as a real-life working farm where students grow an agriculture-based skill set, while also developing entrepreneurial, mathematical, physical and mechanical skills. They tend to the fields and garden crops in season, but they also split fire wood to heat the greenhouses, care for farm animals, complete routine maintenance on power equipment, and seek alternative means of generating revenue to sustain the farm during the winter. That diversification has led to growing sales for their holiday pine and spruce wreaths that come complete with berries and bows, Christmas cactus plants and dried flower arrangements. The students also receive a stipend for their hard work, which adds another layer of accomplishment, according to Brian Novicki, LIU’s transitional coordinator.

The program, though, is more than simply caring, nurturing and cultivating crops. It’s about “helping young people adjust from the school system to whatever comes next,” Novicki says. “There’s a multitude of things happening here. It’s a good feeling to see their excitement and growth. The rewards are the thank-yous from the students or when they tell you they love it here. We are pleased with what we have. Our relationship with Lands and Hillside Farms is great.”

About 30 young adults 16 to 21 years of age have participated in the program since its inception. The Department of Occupational Therapy at Misericordia University added the program as a pediatric fieldwork experience for juniors in the program in 2014. The relationship between the program participants, LIU, Lands at Hillside Farms, and the University expanded last fall with the start of the two-year, faculty-student research study, “Effectiveness of a Transitional Agricultural Training Program for Adolescents with Autism and Developmental Disabilities Based on Outcome Measures.”

“We will measure the vocational program outcomes for students with special needs as they transition into adulthood,” says Jennifer Dessoye, O.T.D., O.T.R./L., assistant professor of occupational therapy at Misericordia University, “and to understand if this program increases skills needed to be employable after the students graduate from high school at 21.”

Misericordia University occupational therapy majors are required to conduct research as part of the five-year academic program’s curriculum. The six students involved in the study voluntarily chose to study the novel program for their own individual reasons. For Erin Huff, O.T.S., of Sugarloaf, it was both personal and professional, as the Hazleton Area High School graduate was influenced by Dr. Dessoye’s past research, “The Effectiveness of iPad Handwriting Applications on Improving Visual Motor and Handwriting Skills in Children with Autism Spectrum Disorder,” and her older brother, Zach, 27, who has Down syndrome.

“I have a brother with special needs who is not at that level of function, but his peers could have benefitted from a program like this,” says the daughter of Kim and Gary Huff. “Growing up with a brother with special needs has made me never look at them differently. Seeing the impact his different services, such as occupational therapy, had on – not just him but my whole family – was what made me choose this profession.

“This profession means a lot to me,” Huff adds.

Student researchers developed and presented the application for the Institutional Review Board (IRB) at Misericordia with assistance from Dr. Dessoie, the faculty research advisor for the project. Once approved, the students began gathering data in September 2015 and completed the process in September 2016. It will take an additional nine to 12 months for the entry-level master’s degree program students Alyssa Auer ’17, O.T.S., Scranton; Fallon Cooper ’17, O.T.S., Freeland; Meghan DiGerolamo ’17, O.T.S., Budd Lake, N.J.; Quinn Fohlinger ’17, O.T.S., Wayne, N.J.; Hausman and Huff to analyze the information by using a set of qualitative (observations and interviews) and quantitative (standardized assessments using Texas Functional Living Scale, Beery Test of Visual Motor Integration and Allen Cognitive Levels) outcome measures.

The research, which is being completed on-site, is being conducted to measure the effectiveness of the transitional program and its efficacy to further the development of transitional programs for people with physical, emotional and developmental disabilities, according to the IRB.

“If the outcome measures resemble these expectations, the effectiveness of the program will be validated and evidence-based,” says the daughter of David and Janice Hausman, a Conestoga Valley High School graduate. “It will justify this program and others like it as suitable for more state funding. Improvements can then be made to the program based on the study’s findings to further benefit the students in the program and the development of the functional capabilities in the target areas.”

“A positive outcome would be creating an array of programs similar to the Dream Green Program across our region and nationally,” adds Dr. Dessoie, “to allow other students with special needs to access the clear benefits of a horticultural transitional program.” ■

Tackling environmental concerns along the shore

Biology major's research shows best method for restoring coastal shorelines and repopulating them with native species

Hunter D. Pates '16 knows how to tackle.

He ably brings down running backs from his linebacker position on the football field, and addresses myriad issues that are important to the student body on campus as vice president of the Student Government Association at Misericordia University.

The Columbus, N.J., native, though, is most proud of his ability to undertake important academic and environmental issues as an undergraduate research scientist and burgeoning coastal ecologist. Pates was one of 28 undergraduate students and 14 faculty members who participated in the 2015 Misericordia University Summer Research Fellowship Program from May 26 to July 31.

"The big thing is over my first three years at Misericordia I really established a strong base on the overall scientific process," Pates says about his undergraduate education. "With that kind of training, it allowed me to go out and put all of those skills to work. It helped make the process feel much easier and go much smoother. What I liked about the fellowship program is I pretty much had the freedom to develop my own research project.

"I felt like I had the freedom to reach out to other scientists in the field and establish that line of communication while getting their feedback and help. That's something I wouldn't have had if I went to a larger research fellowship program or larger school," he adds.

The University-sponsored opportunity took him from the on-campus laboratories in Hafey-McCormick Science Hall, where his interdisciplinary research with fiddler crabs began with Barbara McCraith, Ph.D., associate professor of biology, to the endangered coastal salt marshes, salt marsh islands, and shorelines of Ocean and Cumberland counties in New Jersey. His summer work also enabled him to appreciate the roles biologists and engineers play in fully understanding the coastal system, including the geology, chemistry and biology of this fragile environment.

"The work he did was outstanding," says Dr. McCraith. "He really gets science. I saw it happen his sophomore year. He was turned on by science. He got bit by the research bug."

The goal of Pates' investigation was twofold, as he sought to compare the effectiveness of two different shoreline erosion prevention-restoration projects on Mordecai and Money Islands, and the impact erosion has on the fiddler crab population.

The shore is somewhat of a second home for Pates, as he grew up an hour's drive from the beach on Joint Base McGuire-Dix-Lakehurst, a

AN ESTUARY LIFE

A May 2016 graduate, Pates earned his Bachelor of Science degree in biology. He envisions himself remaining in the field of coastal ecology so he can continue conducting research that has a positive impact on the environment. The undergraduate scientist in him already has revealed his practice of meticulous preparation, as he reviews notes, pictures and research poster while reviewing his collaborative work.

His research topic, “A Living Shoreline Approach to Erosion Prevention and its Effect on Fiddler Crab Burrow Densities on Mordecai Island, Barnegat Bay and Money Island,” required periodic kayak trips since the locations were inaccessible by other means. On Mordecai Island, he established experimental and control sites to quantify the abundance and quality of fiddler crab burrows. He did the same at Money Island, which is technically considered a cape. In each quadrat, Pates counted the burrows and measured their diameters every two weeks at each site in an effort to determine how healthy the environment was for the crabs and other native species of plants, birds and fish.

“Salt marshes, in general, are important as they serve as a filtering system for pollutants,” says Pates, a Northern Burlington County Regional High School graduate. “If they are healthy, it will take away wave energy from hurricanes and storms. They also act as a nursery for juvenile fish, fiddler crabs and other organisms.”

His research was enhanced by ReClam the Bay, a regional educational and environmental nonprofit in Toms River, N.J., that reintroduces clams and military facility about 18 miles outside of Trenton, N.J., with his parents, MSgt. Timothy and Judith Pates. His exploration of beaches in Sea Girt, N.J., during his childhood, and now Beach Haven, Long Beach Island, N.J., shaped a lot of his beliefs on conservation efforts in his home state and elsewhere.

“Just growing up and going down to the shore has helped me to appreciate all that nature has to offer to us,” he says. “And now being able to advocate for environmental causes helps to ensure people will always be able to utilize nature and all it has to offer.”

oysters to the Barnegat Bay estuary to improve water quality; Barnegat Bay Partnership, a national estuary program in Seaside Park, N.J., that works to protect and enhance the Barnegat Bay ecosystem, and the Wilmington, Del.-based Partnership for the Delaware Estuary, one of 28 National Estuary Programs that work to improve the health of estuaries. Representatives of the organizations offered him feedback on his research and also granted him access to Mordecai Island in the Barnegat Bay complex and Money Island in Downe Township that were critical to his research.

Mordecai and Money islands are very similar in size, composition and importance in this complex ecosystem. Mordecai is an uninhabited 45-acre coastal marsh island that is a haven to migrating and indigenous birds and fish. Since the 1930s, about 26 acres of the island's western shore have been lost to storm and manmade erosion, according to New Jersey Audubon. Money is bordered by the Delaware Bay and Gandy's Beach Preserve. Their importance to this fragile ecosystem, though, also cannot be underestimated as it is a refuge for endangered bird species, like the Black Skimmer, American Oystercatchers and Yellow-crowned Night-Herons, according to the New Jersey Audubon.

This is where their similarities end, though, as different methods are being employed on these coastal shorelines to protect them from erosion, and to rebuild their shorelines and natural habitats.

EROSION PREVENTION

Along the Money Island coast, scientists constructed living shorelines in the spring of 2014. Living shorelines is a relatively new concept along the Northeast Coast, but it has been used off the coasts of the Carolinas, Georgia, Florida and Louisiana to manage vanishing shorelines due to natural erosion and destructive hurricanes. Natural shorelines utilize organic materials to protect the shore from the energy of waves and to rebuild and, in turn, repopulate the shores with native species.

A healthy and stable shoreline, for example, will have an ample supply of ribbed muscles in the sand, while also stimulating the proliferation of tall grasses that attract nesting birds, like the Piping Plover.

By utilizing coconut or coir fiber logs situated between wooden posts, and positioning oyster bags – mesh bags filled with oyster shells – in front of the fiber logs at Money Island, erosion slowed and fresh sediment was retained that enabled fresh vegetation growth and a healthy environment for native species.

Erosion has devoured most of Mordecai Island's lower marsh through the years. Conservation efforts here are being enhanced by manmade geotubes – long, high-strength woven geotextile tubes filled

“What I liked about the fellowship program is I pretty much had the freedom to develop my own research project.”

– Hunter D. Pates '16

Pates' research data show the living shoreline is more effective in “enhancing fiddler crab recruitment and in reestablishing marsh habitat” compared to the geotubes. Money Island's density for burrows was 118 per meter square, while Mordecai's was only 23 per meter square. Therefore, his research suggests the use of organic material is more effective than geotubes in “enhancing fiddler crab recruitment and in reestablishing marsh habitat.”

“His research is important for a couple of reasons,” Dr. McCraith adds, while reviewing a copy of his poster presentation. “It's important for Hunter himself, as he made connections and started networking with people in research in New Jersey and Delaware. From that, he has really started to develop an understanding of the interconnectedness of everything in the marine system there – not just the science, but the economy and the social impacts as we start losing the shoreline.

“As the students in our fellowship program develop a better understanding of their research and the impact of shoreline erosion, they are hopefully going to be leaders in their communities, and they can educate people and influence policy based on that level of understanding. The education we are giving our students is going to carry on through their whole life.” ■ with sand – that are placed offshore to absorb wave energy. The first phase of the project was completed in 2009. It has yet to be determined when the project will be completed.

A HEALTHY ENVIRONMENT

Fiddler crabs are a good tool to measure a healthy shore environment. An abundance of the small crustaceans, for example, indicates a healthy salt marsh, while plentiful, but smaller burrow sizes indicate an increased recruitment of the crabs into the environment. An abundant fiddler crab population also aerates the soil, which encourages native grasses, like cord grass Spartina alterniflora, to take root. Conversely, fewer burrows exist on shorelines with active erosion.

Hunter D. Pates '16, a May 2016 graduate, presented his research, “A Living Shoreline Approach to Erosion Prevention and its Effect on Fiddler Crab Burrow Densities on Mordecai Island, Barnegat Bay and Money Island,” at the 92nd Annual Meeting of the Pennsylvania Academy of Science on April 1-3, 2016 at Delaware Valley University, Doylestown, Pa.

Denis Anson, M.S., O.T.R., the director of research and development at the Misericordia University Assistive Technology Research Institute, is a member of the global team of researchers developing Global Public Inclusive Infrastructure or GPII. In the photo, he holds a GPII preference card next to a computer screen showing features of the mailbox.

World Wide Access

Assistive Technology Research Institute collaborates on international GPII project to open the Internet to users of all abilities and ages

Alice, Dave, Davey, Elaine, Elmer, Elod and Livia do not exist in the literal sense. Their names and personal profiles are fictitious, but the role these characters are playing in the development of a revolutionary assistive technology cannot be overestimated.

In cyberspace, these seven case studies provide faces that help to identify a technology that can be hard to grasp. Each of these personas represents someone you may know or who you can imagine living in your neighborhood. They embody the kinds of limitations that are common to using modern technology. Each is being used to demonstrate the Global Public Inclusive Infrastructure (GPII), a system currently under development that allows each user's personal preferences and needs to be stored "in the cloud," and recalled to any device.

GPII users' preferences are referenced by an identifying number that can be stored on a plastic card or key – sometimes the size of a credit card – which contains a Radio Frequency Identification (RFID) computer chip that is readable by computers, terminals or smartphones armed with Near Field Communication (NFC). The number also can be stored in a ring or a patterned image that can be held up to a webcam. When activated, GPII calls the owner's personal preferences onto the current device, and automatically configures it to operate the way the individual prefers.

Oftentimes, people who require special tools or settings on their computers and mobile devices to use them effectively are left with few alternatives without GPII technology. They can make proper adjustments to their home computers, smartphones and tablets, but what happens when they leave the comfort of their homes or are without their personally configured device at a library, an airport kiosk, or a family member's home? These computers are configured for "typical" users and present insurmountable barriers to people with special needs.

Take Elod, for example. He is a 62-year-old retiree who has low vision, according to his profile that was fabricated by researchers. He needs assistive technology to properly access the computer, the World Wide Web, and all the information and opportunity it has to offer. In order to use the computer effectively, Elod needs the text and icons on the screen to be larger than normal. When he touches his GPII preferences card to the computer, it obtains information about how it should look for him. With one swipe of his RFID card, Elod's home or public computer loads his personal preferences, in this case, for full-screen magnification at 200-percent with a blue background and other private nuances. Once finished, Elod swipes his card against the computer a second time and it reverts back to the default state for other users.

"He didn't have to ask anybody for help," says Denis Anson, M.S., O.T.R., a member of the global team of researchers developing GPII and also the director of research and development at the Misericordia University Assistive Technology Research Institute (ATRI). "He didn't have to reveal that he didn't see well. With GPII, you do not have to request your accommodations because they follow you wherever you go."

The card is also secure, as it does not contain any of the users' personal information, such as Social Security numbers, bank accounts, credit cards, or other valuable information. The card carries only a number associated with a preference file in the cloud. While each person is different, there may be many people who share a single preference file, just as many people wear the same shoe size, according to Anson.

Livia, another of the GPII personas, is a 15-year-old girl who is legally blind. She uses her key to open an on-board screen reader on the computer. Since there are multiple screen readers available on the market for the visually impaired, her profile loads the one she is accustomed to using and her other preferences, including voice controls.

The average person reads about 500 words per minute, according to Anson, and speaks about 150 words. To allow Livia to keep up in school, she has learned to understand a specific voice at her reading speed of 470 words per minute. For her to work effectively, the GPII must provide the screen reader with the controls she knows, the voice she is familiar with, the rate of talking she can understand, and many other settings. Adjusting all of these settings by hand on an unfamiliar computer, especially for someone with Livia's physical challenges, would be nearly impossible. With GPII, all of the settings are automatically adjusted to her needs. As Livia moves from class to class in school, or to the computer at the public library, her GPII preferences assure

"With GPII, you do not have to request your accommodations because they follow you wherever you go."

*– Denis Anson M.S., O.T.R.
Director of research and development, ATRI*

that she can keep pace with an academic class, for example, or simply understand sentences or stories.

“For some people, the personal preference file will include hundreds of individual settings for multiple products. Since the preference file lives in the cloud, it will be available for any connected device, assuring it will behave just the way you want,” Anson adds about the computer’s reaction to the already established personal preferences.

The overarching goal of the GPII project is to ensure that everyone can access and use information technology, including the Internet and smartphones, to the fullest extent possible, no matter the barrier. Whether the limitation is due to disability, literacy, digital literacy or aging, GPII can assure accessibility. GPII does not create new technologies or services. Instead, it is creating the infrastructure for making the development, identification, delivery and use of assistive technologies for the web easier and more cost efficient and effective.

“GPII is a transport system,” Anson explains. “It does not make assistive technology. It is like Amazon, as it delivers your technology. But unlike Amazon, GPII delivers your technology to wherever you are. Your preferences can be delivered in seconds.”

The Internet and modern technology admittedly can be overwhelming for some people, whether because of age or skillset. Consider Elaine, an elderly grandmother who wants to communicate with her children and grandchildren through e-mail and the exchange of family pictures. GPII’s profile for this persona – after she swipes her RFID card – includes the Easy 1-2-3 program that features large icons – a mailbox for e-mails, a photo album for pictures, and an address book for contacts – that easily identifies their function. Unlike some systems that allow users to communicate only with other users of that technology, the easy-to-understand features of Easy 1-2-3 overlay familiar programs like Gmail, Picasa and a Google address book.

“Everything is all nice and big and easy to use,” Anson acknowledges while demonstrating it in the ATRI lab in John J. Passan Hall. “It is a different skin around the same program everyone else uses. Elaine doesn’t have to know that all computers don’t work this way. She can go to her neighbor's or the Bridge Club, and their computer knows her interface, her e-mail, her photo library. She can show her pictures or a nice message. When she's done all the stuff goes away off the neighbor's computer and she hasn't left anything behind."

Graphic elements also encourage user friendliness. An e-mail is designed to look like a postcard and contains an image of the recipient where a stamp is usually placed; large rectangular buttons contain easy-to-understand destinations for "keep," "reply," and "throw away." Once you hit send for an e-mail, the postcard is tucked neatly into an envelope, loads onto a mail truck and is sent to its destination "so there is no doubt that I sent an e-mail," Anson adds.

Additionally, the GPII interface allows users to adjust text size, fonts, line spacing, contrast, language, foreground and background, and more. It will also be applicable for ATMs, cell phones, kiosks and other portable devices. Banks in Spain are planning to field test it within the year, according to Anson.

GPII has been in development since 2011. Europe was the first to commit financial resources. Since then, the United States, through the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services' National Institute on Disability, Independent Living, and Rehabilitation Research or NIDILRR, and Canada have supported it as well. More than 50 researchers with backgrounds in computer programming, engineering, information technology, occupational therapy and more are engaged in the project.

Anson is working to develop the GPII Shopping and Alerting Aid tool. It will help people with physical and other related challenges determine what assistive or adaptive technologies they need. The tool enables users to select from 149 options that identify need under categories such as hearing, vision, touch, operability, speech, understanding orientation and more. Each area contains subsets that expands the query and, in turn, narrows the field of options.

"Simply giving a person with a limitation a list of hundreds of possible products is of little use. It is too much information about things I don't care about," says Anson. "The user, though, can indicate they would like larger print and to be able to set the text and background color. The Shopping Aid can filter thousands of possible products to just those that provide the requested features.

"Now I can look through a small set of products to find the things I want," Anson adds. "The people who manufacture assistive technologies currently are not competitors for GPII. GPII is the way of delivering their products to their customers. It saves time, money and, more importantly, it helps people in need navigate countless products in the commercial marketplace that may or may not meet their needs."

GPII will advance to the testing phase by late 2016. ■

The Assistive Technology Research Institute (ATRI) is a regional resource that provides information and education in the application of assistive technology and universal design principles that helps individuals with limited function to participate in their personal lives to the greatest extent possible.

ATRI's activities include research into the usability of devices and products that are specifically marketed to individuals with disabilities and are intended to improve their function, as well as products that are intended for the general population, but have been designed to be used by people with functional restrictions and able-bodied individuals.

History of Misericordia University

1924 – 2016

Misericordia University is a Catholic, co-educational institution of higher learning that was founded in Dallas, Pa., as an all-women's college in 1924 by the Religious Sisters of Mercy. The academic foundation of the first four-year, degree-granting institution of higher education in Luzerne County is rooted in a rigorous liberal arts curriculum.

Over the years, Misericordia became the region's premier college for educating and training students in teacher education, and in the health and medical sciences. In 2007, Misericordia achieved University status. Today, it offers 42 academic programs in full- and part-time formats that lead to bachelor's, master's or doctoral degrees in three colleges: Arts and Sciences, Health Sciences and Education, and Business.

An NCAA Division III school, Misericordia offers 25 men's and women's varsity sports. Sixty-eight percent of our student athletes maintain a 3.0 grade point average or higher.

Misericordia was established based on the tenets of Mercy, Service, Justice and Hospitality. For more than 90 years, the University community has been an advocate for volunteerism, social justice and service to the marginalized of society. During the 2014-15 academic year, students completed 195,396 hours of service and service learning around the world.

With enrollment of nearly, 2,900 undergraduate and graduate students, Misericordia has earned regional acclaim and national recognition for its dedication to quality academics, service leadership and professional preparation.

In 2016, Washington Monthly magazine ranked MU among the top 24 percent of all master's degree-granting institutions that were recognized in the "2016 National Universities – Masters" category. The magazine also gave Misericordia a "Best Bang for the Buck" designation.

Furthermore, U.S. News & World Report listed Misericordia in the top tier of the 2017 Best Regional Universities-North category in the annual edition of Best Colleges. Ranked 44th out of 143 colleges and universities, Misericordia has climbed 23 places in the annual rankings since 2007. The University also earned a "Best Value" designation from U.S. News, ranking 25th in the category.

The Princeton Review also recognized Misericordia as one of the top colleges and universities in the "2017 Best Regional Colleges" section of its website. Money Magazine named Misericordia to the 2016-17 Best Colleges list, which is designed to help parents and students determine which colleges "deliver the most value."

Misericordia offers more than 900 classes per semester on campus, in the community and online to serve traditional and adult students.

Today, the University has 33 total academic and residential buildings on the main campus and along Lake Street in Dallas Borough, including John J. Passan Hall, the state-of-the-art home of the College of Health Sciences and Education. More than 900 students are living in University housing during the fall 2016 semester.

The main campus of Misericordia University features more than 124 acres.
